

Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all. (Henry VI)

Some people do not hesitate to condemn others, deeming that it is righteous, whereas others believe that it is at least unfair and that noticing the flaws of others only means that you have the same ones. In my opinion, this problem is still relevant today and everyone should analyze his behavior before telling somebody off for imperfections.

There are no perfect and ideal people in the world, therefore, it is always easier to identify drawbacks in somebody's speech and demeanor, but it is quite difficult to do the same with yourself. Some people may eat too loudly; others are too cruel with their parents. However, as soon as one detects such a subjectively inappropriate behavior and expresses an objection, he shows his own discourtesy and intolerance in his character.

Instead of judging someone for his flaws, a person should analyze his own ones; otherwise, it may destroy relationships and lead to dire consequences. Most prominently, it can be seen in marriages in which people cannot get on well with each other, blaming that their spouses are so imperfect and thinking that somewhere in the world there is an ideal mate who would not be so deficient. In fact, if there is an imperfection that one can see in others, it means that probably they had done something similar before, but they are too afraid of acknowledging this. This misunderstanding between spouses leads to problems in marriages and sometimes to a divorce.

In conclusion, the problem of being judgmental is topical today and implies the existence of the impatience and irritability; hence, I believe that in order to be in good terms with others, everyone should analyze his own behavior first and be tolerant enough towards others' imperfections.
